LINE Voice

At LINE we bring information, services, and people closer together. Our writing reflects this spirit. CLOSING THE DISTANCE means knowing whom to write for, writing to be understood, and writing for our audience, not ourselves.

LINE is CLEAR

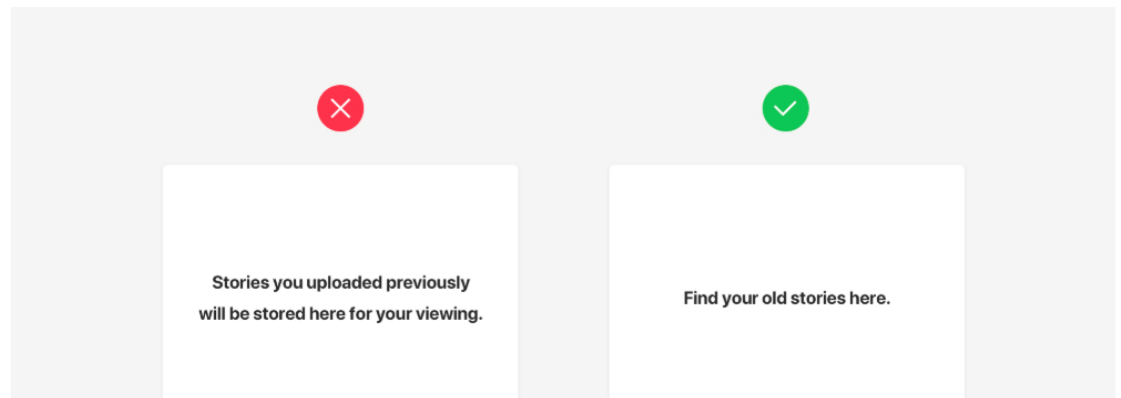

If nothing else, text must be understood. Trim away unimportant information to make the main ideas impossible to miss. Part of this means using consistent language and terminology, but when choosing between consistency and clarity, go for clarity.

Avoid over-explaining with technical jargon

Use unambiguous language. Users shouldn't have to think, let alone guess about an action.

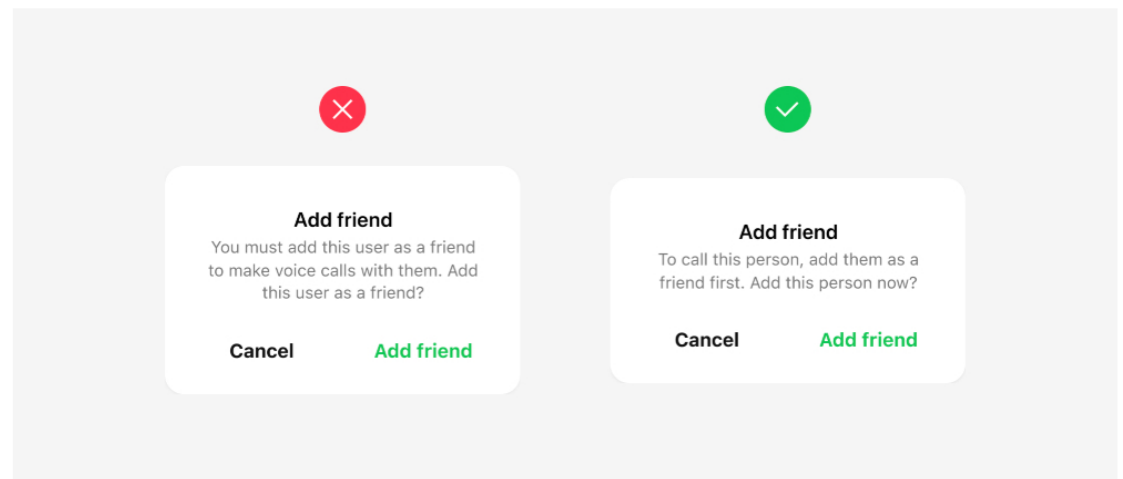

Keep it short

LINE is CONVERSATIONAL

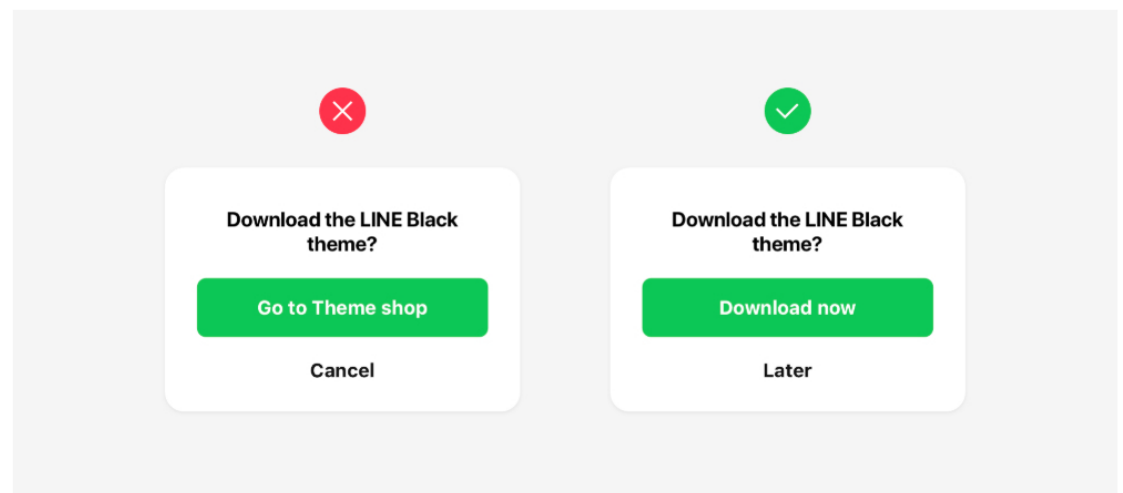

Our job is to translate the complex into the intuitive. This means always speaking the user's language. Even when delivering complex, technical information, it's best to stay human. By providing text inputs that reflect what the user wants, we should let users feel that we "get them."

Most casual users don't think of themselves as "users." Go for more natural words.

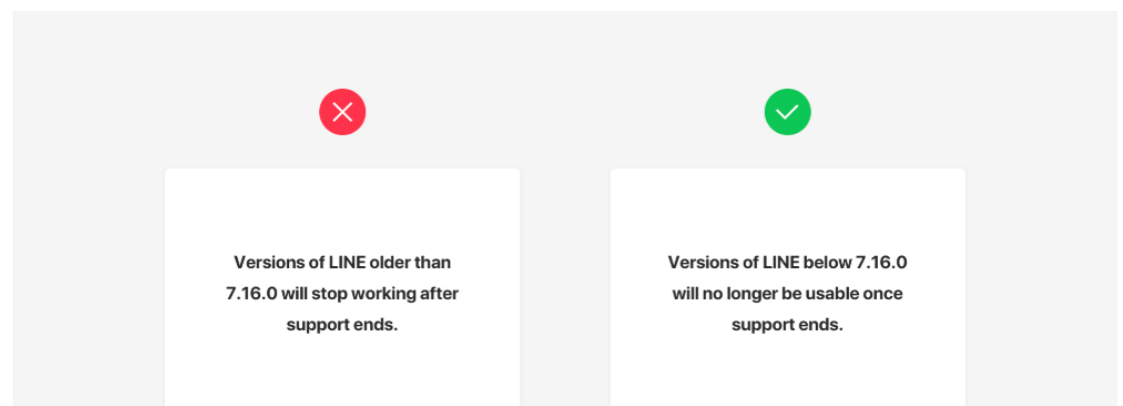

Buttons are the user's voice

Anticipate the user's intent with intelligent button labels.

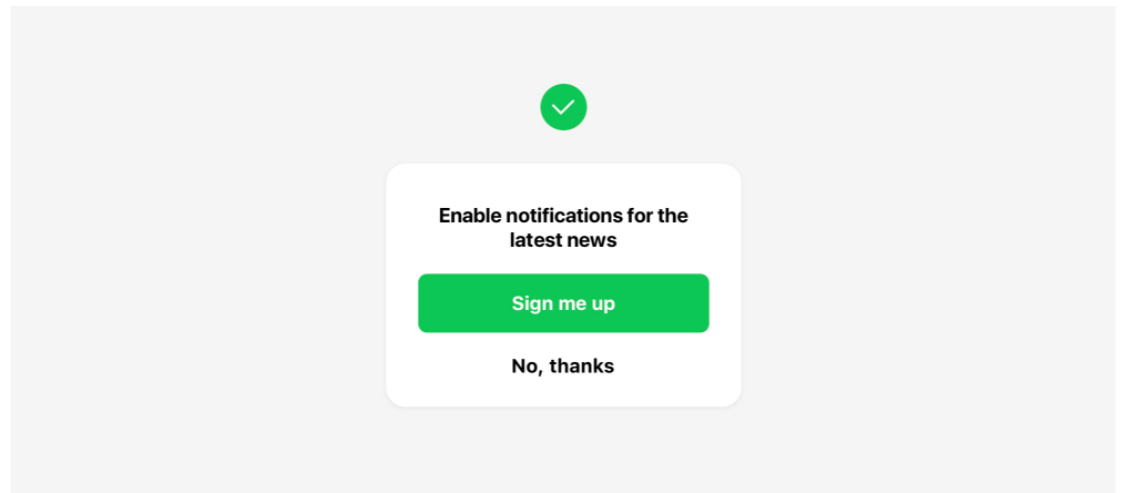

Use active sentences

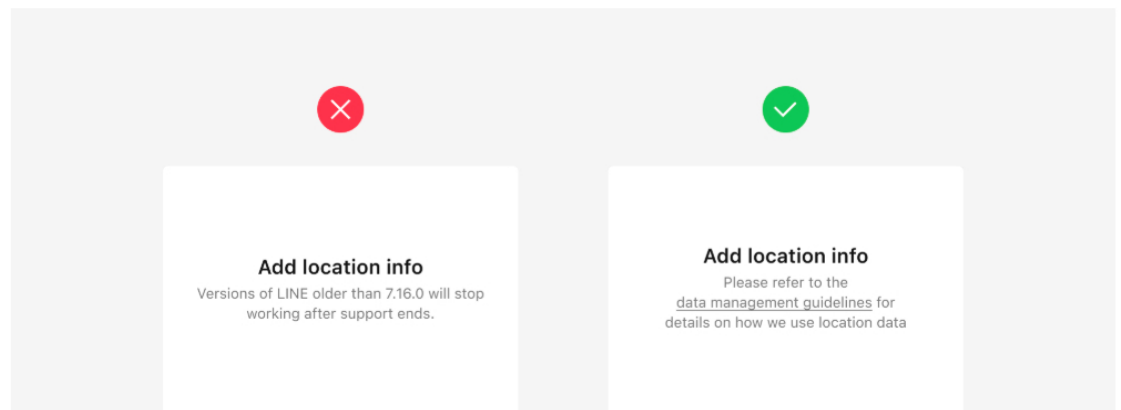

LINE is CONSIDERATE

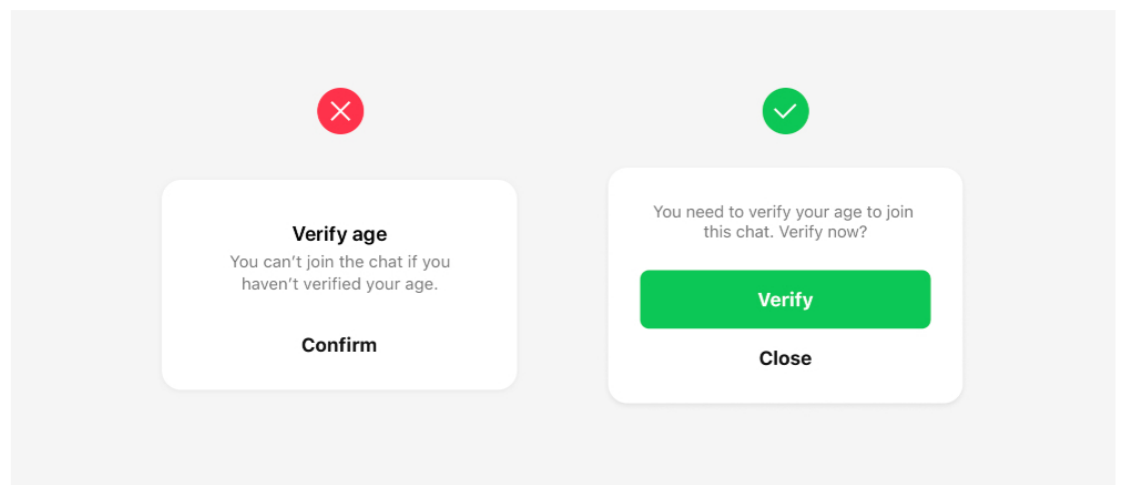

We never know exactly who our users are, but we still have to think in their shoes. Avoid assumptions and keep the user's goals in mind. A considerate writer makes things easy by preparing solutions for problems ahead of time.

Use descriptive links instead of URLs paired with instructions

Emphasize what users can do instead of what they can't
